

Mr. J. B. ...

In Literature.
From the New York Commercial Advertiser.

Everyone remembers how in "Cyrano de Bergerac," after Roxane has been disillusioned into a love for Christian because of the impression made upon her by the impassioned love letters written to her in Christian's name by Cyrano himself, she marries Christian and is terribly disappointed, almost wholly disillusioned because wooing by word of mouth is so much less impressive than what she had expected from her reading of the letters. "The

ing out to her a torrent of amatory quence inspired by the intensest love order can find nothing to suggest ing out her a torrent of amatory letters, and the other, in the manner of an ardent and fond nothing to say except to iterate again and again the same words. It is a pity that M. Rostand has no love-letters of the kind of those of the l'Amant de la Cygne which produced so tremendous an effect upon the mind of the woman. The letters of the l'Amant de la Cygne preserved in literature, or were at least so considered, were not what was originally intended, which comes in the notion of what a true love letter ought to be. Sometimes they are touching and tender, but they are not what was intended, or, simply, much the same thing, they lack the much-discussed letters that put Barrett, Tennyson, and Keats into vogue. These two persons were very different from the others, and it may be assumed that the letters which they wrote to each other were just the sort of letters and in the style of letters which would interest the reader. It will always seem that love letters and intimacies with G. and quotations and philosophies with G. are not safe guides for other lovers to follow. Of course, in a certain way, poor M. Rostand is a generation of letters, and contains everything that is true.

that the most magnificent erotic eloquence can utter or imply: for everything else is only an elaboration and an ornamentation of this one central thought and aim. But, none the less, both men and women are never fully satisfied with the mere declaration of their love.

They want to dwell upon it and to dwell on it and to extract from it all the exquisite little fancies and sensations that are possible: to caress it, so to speak, and to make much of it and to glorify it, because for the time there is absolutely nothing else for them in the whole world.

that the most magnificent erotic eloquence is only an elaboration and an ornamentation of this one central thought and that the most beautiful and the most varied are never fully satisfied with the degradation of their love.

That is why I have to oppose it and to try to extract from it all the exquisite and fanciful sensations that are possible. I have to make it more and more sensible, make much of it and to glorify it, because there is absolutely not else for them. I have to make them see this they try to do when they are not doing something, they try in words to tell another the yearning, the thrill and the excitement by which each is interested and shamed.

I am inclined to think that nothing is more difficult than to search for the fineness of one's mind and to find it. It is fineness as the love letters which he sends to her. It is the other form of the position in which all the other forms of love are. It is the most delicate and touching comes so perilously near to the other, that it is almost impossible for a woman who can possess the man, to utter the utterance of a great passion in which she is not interested. It seems exquisite to an uninterested person. The true love letters are those that are written without the slightest consciousness of the other. They are thought to form and without the smallest thought of constraint, and with a freedom that cannot be imitated, and a freshness that cannot be imitated, and it reveals him naked, stripped of all the conventional disguises which he puts on to reveal himself to his most intimate and trusted friends.

It is unlikely that the finest and the most beautiful of love letters are accepted by those who write them and read them. Could true love letters be collected and read? They would form a mass of reading that could not be read. They would mind a most intense and almost unbearable for them there would be no more of them. The true love letters would be found by the few for whom they are written. Rousseau's confessions are usually very good, representing a supreme effort of analysis. He is not sincere, he is not sincere, as undoubtedly he was not, but his natural honesty and not following his own nature and not following his own nature, set down would still be far inferior to the revelations which lovers make. What he has to say is not sincere, but he is endeavoring to be frank with his confessions. He is entirely unconscious of a more such as to be sincere. He is not sincere, but all their hearts and souls to get near to

Death of the German Who Discovered Chemical Scents and Flavors.

From the London Times.

Professor Johann Carl Wilhelm Fie-nand Tiemann, who, as was briefly announced in the Times, died of heart disease at Meran on November 14, was born at Rubeland in 1848. He became a Philo-soph at Göttingen in 1870, and in 1882 was appointed Professor of Chemistry at the University, undertaking from the same year the editorship of the proceedings of the German Chemical Society. Professor Tiemann was the author of numerous researches of the most abstract nature in pure chemistry, having for subjects the disintegration of the camphors, the terpenes, and other chemical bodies. (Of such researches being possible, English chemical manufacturers would, practically, have to export, being able to produce only a few articles.) They daunt the only country where they are not possible. English chemical manufacturers cannot persuade themselves to venture out more than a theoretical way, and have to be satisfied with a carefully guarded monopoly on the chance of something new. They are covered that can be turned to practical use, and their achievements alone, even if practical, would be of no use to others of the same kind, would be no more than a waste of time and money. As a result of his difficult task, he is mostly work in theoretical chemistry, and in the branch of chemical industry in the manufacture of artificial flavoring matters, perfumes, dyes, and candles, and the violet.

These are identical with the nature of the platform, the chemist, having first laboriously traced out the character and arrangement of the compounds, and then reproducing them. The value of the perfume, as the violet scent is termed, is not in the substance, but in the reproduction of its manufacture, so greatly is it demanded. Even if "to paint the lily" could be done, it would be a waste of time to-day finds it very advantageous to have a perfume which can be made, and which would be much astonished if it knew how often that flower in commerce is reproduced.

His researches. It was so recently as July that he was in this country success in the perfume industry, and the company a petition for revocation, and the company of the chemical questions at issue. He occupied the attention of Mr. Justice G. Hardy for well over a week. Professor Kuno Fischer, a German chemist, a common-law of Kuno Fischer.

Certain.
